Emin Pasha's recall by the German government will be accounted another vindication of the judgment of Henry M. Stanley. The great explorer's poor opinion of the ex-governor of the khedive's equatorial province was generally hought to be inspired by prejudice growing out of personal differences and professional rivalry; but it is now clear that others as well as Stanley find the Pasha's methods impracticable and hazardous. It is very likely that there has taken place a change in the man himself. He must have had masterful qualities to maintain his authority so long in his isolated dominion. But the faculties of adaptability, subordination and co-operation seem to have departed from him. It is not likely that the Germans would, without grave cause, have confessed a failure in his leadership, in the acquisition of which he took much pride,

Amount of vapor in the air, during such hours, is but little less than the usual normal saturation of the air during such heated period. Perhaps it would be more accurate to say that during such hours that the temperature of air the was a few degrees greater than before and hence demanded more vapor to saturate it. One fact is obvious on this point, viz: That as the temperature of the air becomes less the destruction ceases.

Therefore we may safely conclude that the temperature is the highest and that the additional vapor needed is an amount equal to the difference required by the increased temperature of the air for a few hours or from two to five days only.
